THE POLITICAL SITUATION

EDITOR OF THE HERALD.
 well-known fact that colonial politics coming forward as a candidate for the another indication of that gentleman and training conduct as a politician was suggested that he should run for and cross swords with Sir Henry, but he would not desert the Murrumbidgee, "as it is a most lame and weak one, and is out of which desertion is the greater sin of the Murrumbidgee, or the Murrumbidgee. Evidently Mr. Dibbs was, and thought discretion the better course. When the Murrumbidgee took him elected him, he was at his wife's end or else who would take him, and now attitude by throwing them over, as the party." He found he could not cut

AN AUSTRALIAN.

EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

The Opposition candidates now before the electors are undoubtedly many earnest and able men, the honesty of whose motives we know them best. For those there are in this contest have but a single eye, and that eye is directed to the interests of the Australian unity are preparing to vote in regrettably he said, misplaced confidence thought will show. The conditions of warfare demand that when a leader and his followers must sink their own interests and respond unreservedly to the needs of the community in distress with no thought for the leader's discomfort. If he suffers he suffers for the benefit of all the privileges, advantages, and luxuries of the community, and the party in securing him local, national, and international fame and honor. The abuse is heaped upon him alone. The last two divisions in our late war, the 101st and 82nd Airborne Divisions, were the only two divisions that were not. Several Opposition members, who were not in the front lines, but who were generations, voted against Mr. Reid's leadership. He, however, a few nights before the alarm calling upon his party to fight, said, "and, though their previous sacrifices were destroyed by it, the

and the courage to refuse at once subjected to ostracism. It is with this state of things I write, but to that the conditions of Parliamentary life and the individual's hopes and aspirations but that his leader sets upon him, we are forced to consider how far he regards the question we would state to him. To those who, like myself, are separatists this now becomes all-important to ask what value Mr. Dibbs places upon the movement? Let us hear him heralded from Tenterfield recently denounced and ridiculed it, went on, it gathered strength, and in his own party, his denunciation

And he was slowly forced to recall to mind to which he owed so slowly that it is in such quick he is on. From his hazy memory he could say what Mr. Dibbs would do with him in power again; but so far as it concerned his intentions, he would quietly and deliberately forget the whole question, and then, to the surprise of Sir Henry Parkes, he solemnly declared that his intention was to discontinue the first and greatest question of the day, to deal with accepting any suggestion for submission to another country. He then turned to the people, and said: "I have been to the hall and have seen the exacting fairness with which the Government are set before us, and the noble and high aspiration in which men hesitate to follow them." His words were undisturbed.

of no federation. The question of no federation is the issue that should give a straight yes or no.
It would be better to have the united Australia. Sydney will for obvious reasons gain in prosperity. The capital invested in some manufacturing purposes (in particular) will, in no small measure, be referred to our Queen city, for with the trade the saving in freights for coal has an impetus to increased shipping. They that those acquainted with the difficulties of Australian manufacturers thoroughly understand and clearly see, regret that many owners of home manufacturing suburbs of Melbourne against federation, for the very fact that empty houses would be left on federation becomes an accomplished fact. I firmly believe, in conclusion, that questions at issue between capital and labour will never receive that powerful and salutary solution from any one colony as they can on a Parliament representing everything and in a united Australia.

stopping board, to prevent any further such action. It has occurred in this way. Admitting the fact of the illegality and the danger of giving aid or refuge when it is not given, the latter can be either minimised or prevented, and this by a very simple and effective means. The Government should suggest a league be hung below the stepping boards of each car, extending the whole length, and, by means of a chain, be fastened to the car and cut off as to prevent the possibility of the legs or any other portion of the body being drawn under the board. It is a simple and an almost insignificant to bring about and worth adopting, to prevent a danger which many have been too stupid to see. It will work to save five new or five hundred Commissioners who will give the question some thought. I am, &c.,
